RESEARCH GRANT

Title: Wellbeing and Fertility Policies (WelFerPoli)

Titolo: Benessere e Politiche per la Famiglia (WelFerPoli)

DESCRIPTION OF THE RESEARCH ACTIVITY

Description: Public policies have a prominent role and a social responsibility in enabling individuals to achieve their desired fertility by removing the obstacles that prevent couples from having (more) children if they wish to. The literature showed that: 1) the implications of the unmet desire for children for Subjective Well-Being are under-investigated, especially in low-fertility settings such as Italy; 2) while there is consensus that policies explicitly targeted to raise fertility are needed in low-fertility settings, we lack an understanding of which policy mix can be effective to reach the goal.

The research activity of the post-doc within the WelferPoli project has two specific objectives, which allow to fill gaps in knowledge by 1) shedding light on the existence of a well-being penalty among individuals who achieved a smaller-than-desired family size or are involuntarily childless; 2) investigating to what extent family policies can intervene to eliminate the obstacles that prevent individuals from becoming parents or achieving their desired fertility. Identifying an effective policy mix could reduce the hypothesised well-being penalty and, more broadly, ensure a just, inclusive society and a sustainable welfare state in the years to come. To properly tackle the evaluation of the effectiveness of family policies (objective 2), the post-doc recruited within the WelferPoli project will carry out two types of empirical analysis: an ex-ante (through the application of Factorial Survey Experiments) and an ex-post evaluation of policies (secondary data analysis). Both the analyses will systematically take into account: 1) synergy effects between different policy interventions (policy mix) rather than individual policy instruments; 2) interactions with individual characteristics (e.g., childless vs. parent, age, gender, education, region, etc.) in order to account for heterogeneous effects of policies for different population groups.

Descrizione: Le politiche pubbliche hanno un ruolo di rilievo e una responsabilità sociale nel consentire agli individui di raggiungere la loro fecondità desiderata, rimuovendo gli ostacoli che impediscono alle coppie di avere (più) figli se lo desiderano. La letteratura ha mostrato che: 1) le implicazioni del desiderio insoddisfatto di figli per il benessere soggettivo sono poco investigate, soprattutto in contesti a bassa fecondità come l'Italia; 2) mentre c'è consenso sul fatto che siano necessarie politiche esplicitamente mirate a aumentare la fecondità in contesti a bassa fecondità, manca una comprensione di quale combinazione di politiche possa essere efficace nel raggiungere l'obiettivo.

L'attività di ricerca dell'assegnista all'interno di WelFerPoli ha due obiettivi specifici, che consentono di colmare lacune nella conoscenza attraverso: 1) fare luce sull'esistenza di uno svantaggio in termini di benessere soggettivo tra individui che hanno raggiunto una dimensione familiare inferiore a quella desiderata o sono involontariamente senza figli; 2) indagare in che misura le politiche familiari possano intervenire per eliminare gli ostacoli che impediscono alle persone di diventare genitori o raggiungere la loro fecondità desiderata. Identificare una combinazione efficace di politiche potrebbe ridurre la presunta penalizzazione in termini di benessere e, più in generale, garantire una società giusta, inclusiva e uno stato sociale sostenibile nei prossimi anni. Per affrontare adeguatamente la valutazione dell'efficacia delle politiche familiari (obiettivo 2), l'assegnista integrerà due tipi di analisi: una valutazione ex-ante (attraverso l'applicazione di Factorial Survey Experiments) e una valutazione ex-post delle politiche (attraverso un'analisi di dati secondari). Entrambe le analisi terranno sistematicamente conto di effetti di sinergia tra diversi interventi di policy piuttosto che singoli strumenti, e di interazioni con caratteristiche individuali (senza figli/genitori, età, genere, istruzione, regione) al fine di considerare gli effetti eterogenei delle politiche.
